

In various nations, life-quality in big cities is worsening. In this essay, I would like to analyse the problem of this issue and suggest some feasible solutions.

One main reason is that there are too many people moving to large cities to find jobs or education. This makes the cities very crowded and noisy. As a result, traffic jams happen every day, and people spend many hours on the road. Another problem is pollution. More vehicles and factories produce dirty air and waste, which make people's health worse. The cost of living is also very high, so many people feel stressed and tired.

To solve these problems, the government can improve public transport, such as buses and trains, so people do not need to use private cars or motorbikes. It is also important to make more green spaces and parks, so citizens can relax and enjoy fresh air. In addition, the authorities should create more jobs and schools in rural areas. This can reduce the number of people moving to cities.

In conclusion, the quality of life in big cities is getting worse because of overpopulation, pollution, and high living costs. With good public transport, more green areas, and development in the countryside, this problem can be improved in the future.
